

Telehealth quick guide

For the safety of your patients and the health of your hospital, turn to telehealth.

For years, telehealth has been increasing in demand across the country – but it's now become a critical component of patient care and safety.

During this time of crisis, telehealth can help you:

- Hire specialists not otherwise available in your state. In fact, licensing restrictions have been temporarily eased or lifted in many parts of the nation, giving you access to even more providers.
- Ease the burden of securing additional PPE. With telehealth, you can even continue to employ physicians in self-quarantine.
- Realize better reimbursements. CMS has increased allowed rates for telemedicine visits to be equivalent to an in-person appointment.

- Staff rural locations. In remote locations, where on-site providers are limited, telehealth can provide effective patient care.
- Protect your community's health. With no risk of unnecessary exposure, patients can receive home healthcare, get consultations, and even be observed taking their blood pressure or blood sugar readings.

We built our business by knowing how to help you with yours – that's never been more important than right now. Our experience and expertise give you fast access to high-quality healthcare providers in high-demand specialties – prepared to work on-site or through telemedicine.
